

We define “local” as food that is grown, caught, raised, or made in Washington State. But, more importantly, we think ‘local’ should signify an area where you could feasibly “know your farmer.” We have an abundance of food available in our state, and “local” food is more than just measuring miles – it’s getting to know farmers, fishers, and food producers that are part of our communities.

Use this handy guide to plan your meals and menus according to Washington’s harvest season. Make your shopping list for trips to farm stores, u-pick farms, farmers markets, co-ops, and the many grocers that prioritize sourcing from Washington’s farms, fishers and artisans.

Seasonality varies with weather and from farm to farm. Some farms, through storage, processing, or indoor growing methods, may have products during “off” seasons—visit the farm’s website or social media to check on current availability.
